When you look at a running horse, you know immediately that it is alive; a beach pebble, by contrast, is nonliving. What distinguishes the two is life, or the state of being alive. Biology is the study of life and living things, and it can be divided into two main fields, Zoology and Botany. People who study Biology are known as biologists; the living organisms they study range from animals such as horses to micro-organisms such as green algae. All use energy obtained from food and released by respiration in order to fulfil their natural processes.

Biology covers a number of different studies. Ecology examines how living things interact and where they live. Physiology looks at how organisms work. Genetics is concerned with how characteristics inherited from one generation pass to the next. Other branches include Anatomy, Taxonomy Microbiology and Parasitology.

There are around 2 million species of living organisms, and biologists classify them into groups. The largest and most general group is called a kingdom. There are five kingdoms: Monera (bacteria). Protista (protozoa and algae), Fungi, Plantae (plants) and Animalia (animals).
